

Principles for Worker Freedom and Opportunity

Preamble

We believe that earned success through work creates dignity and well-being. We believe in the right of individuals to pursue their desired work or occupation and to exercise their freedom of speech and association in the workplace—whether they work for an employer or for themselves. We believe that workers and families are best served by government policies that promote ample work opportunities and rising incomes without distorting labor markets through burdensome mandates and regulations.

As advocates for workers' rights, we stand for the following principles:

1. The Right to Work. Every worker should have the right to work without having to pay an outside organization or fund politics they do not support.
2. Freedom of Representation and Association. Employees should be free to negotiate directly with their employer and should not be forced to accept representation from a private organization they do not support. Employees should be as free to leave a union or remove a union from their workplace as they are to join or bring one in.
3. Free and Fair Elections. Workers should have the right to vote in secret ballot elections so that they can express their true preference without outside influence. There should be free and robust debate during union organizing campaigns and workers should hear from both sides so that they can make informed decisions.
4. Independent Contractor Freedom. Entrepreneurs and workers should be free to decide for themselves whether they want to work for an employer or for themselves regardless of their education, income, or industry.
5. Traditional Joint Employer Standard. Small businesses and their employees are typically best served when they can work directly with one another as opposed to government policy imposing corporate control and legal liabilities into their operations.
6. Unlimited Earnings Potential. Every worker deserves to be compensated for their contributions without a union contract capping their pay.
7. Retirement Savings Ownership and Control. Workers should have control over their retirement savings. Pensions should be adequately funded, and investment managers should maximize risk-adjusted returns without using workers' retirement funds to advance a political agenda.
8. Flexible and Tailored Benefits. Employees and employers should have the freedom to establish workplace benefits that are best for them instead of being forced into one-size-fits-all government mandates.

9. Freedom of Information. Every union member deserves to know how their union is spending their hard-earned dues money. The U.S. Department of Labor should ensure that workers receive sufficient transparency reports on their unions.
10. Freedom from Harassment. Employees, managers, and employers have a right to be free from harassment, threats, stalking, and violence in the workplace, especially during union-organizing campaigns or collective-bargaining negotiations.
11. Competition Is Essential. Mandating one-size-fits-all bargaining for workers across entire industries harms competition and the flexibility needed to allow workers and small business to excel. Labor law in the United States should not go down the road of sectoral bargaining, because it would hurt employees, consumers, and innovation.
12. Competitive, Unbiased Government Contracting. Government contracts should be granted based on efficiency, and selecting companies that provide the best product at the lowest cost, regardless of whether the company is unionized or not.
